Fingal District Progress Committee Inc. Invitation to the opening of the Fingal Railway Station Saturday October 29 at 11am

Come along and see history being brought back to life

The only other Federation Queen Anne style railway station building from this era is at St Marys but the railway line ends at Fingal, so the potential for the genuine train experience ends at Fingal.

Greater Esk Tourism, and the Northern Midlands and Break O'Day councils - along with the Local Government Association of Tasmania (LGAT) - are lobbying Government and TasRail to permit a steam train to come to the Fingal Valley Festival each year.

A group of us are meeting with the Minister on Friday September 23.

Break O'Day Council wins Building Surveying Team of the Year, Tasmania

September 19, 2016

Break O'Day Council's Building Surveying Team edged out other industry hopefuls to take out the Best Building Surveying Team of the Year, Tasmania. The announcement was made on September 16 at Wrest Point Casino, Hobart.

Community Notices

Calling all fundraisers looking for a new project 2nd meeting of people interested in fundraising for a Regional Park in St Marys including a Skate Ramp

On the 2nd September, the first meeting of a group of interested parties was held at the Mt Elephant Fudge Cafe. Some great ideas were put forward and there were a number of issues to follow up on. The regional park remains a long term goal, and more interested parties are needed to join with us to make this a success for the youth and younger kids of the Fingal Valley.

We need as a community to provide the initial funding support, we already have some in kind donations and also pledged financial donations. If you know anyone who would like to pledge a financial donation please let me know. This will show that we have community backing for such a major project in our municipality.

I am convening this second meeting and hope to have some mums and dads present. The meeting will be held at Mt Elephant Fudge in Story Street St Marys commencing 5pm sharp on Friday October 21, 2016.

Please direct all initial enquires to Clr. Janet Drummond on 0404 562 320 or email janet.drummond@bodc.tas.gov.au

The Say, by Cagerattler

Why do people find it necessary to dump their trash in the bush? This past week just gone I was up on a well used forestry road when I noticed a whole bunch of white.

As I got closer it revealed itself as a bunch of household rubbish but also what must have been several of those foam vegetable / fish boxes (that was the white I could see from a distance). I was on that same track seven days before and it wasn't there then. They had been smashed up and bits were lying all over the place, as was a couple of dozen articles of general rubbish.

Back in July up on the top of Top Marshes Road I found a whole bunch of old bike parts (mostly) scattered across a small area not far off the road - all rusting away and a hazard for wildlife especially.

There is no excuse for this sort of dumping. It causes issues with native fauna and flora, and apart from being downright ugly is also dangerous.

As we head toward the warmer months, errant bottles, other glassware, paper and cardboard products become heat sources and fuel for starting bushfires. How can people be so irresponsible?

It beggars belief. I hope the lazy, inconsiderate so and so's who do this get caught one day and are fined and prosecuted appropriately.

I ended up trying to clean up some of the discarded stuff last week, but fear that if I looked hard enough it's probably the tip of the iceberg.

I have seen it before, as have many others no doubt. If you do see anyone littering in the bush or roadside, dob them in.

I certainly will, because it affects us all.

What do you think?

EON EXPO 2016

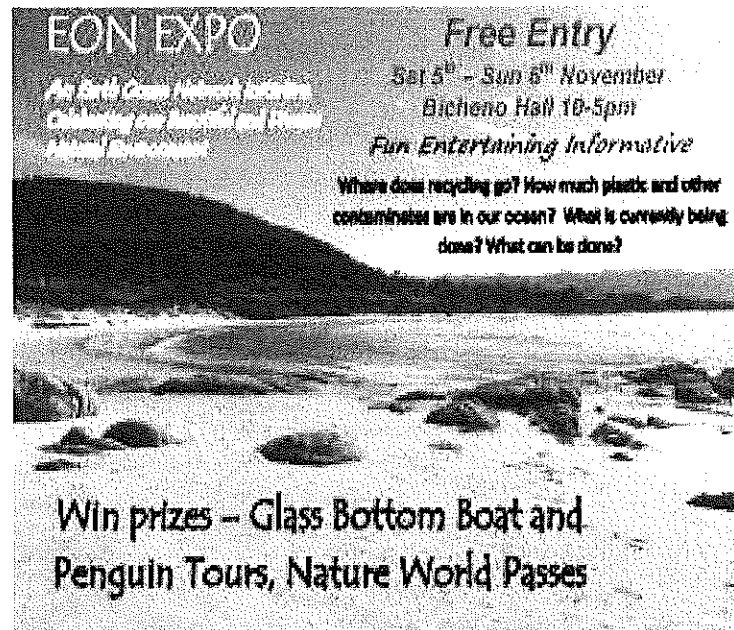

Earth Ocean Network (EON) is set to launch its first EXPO to celebrate our beautiful and diverse natural environment. The November 5th - 6th event will run 10-5pm on Saturday and Sunday.

EON was established in 2010 to support local environmental projects. It raises money by selling second-hand books donated by generous people. All money raised goes back into the community.

All are welcome to the free weekend with a range of entertaining speakers, short films and interactive hubs.

Watch Deb Vogel create an exciting community arts project, utilising plastic waste and marine debris in a sculptural piece highlighting the negative impact of plastic on our environment.

Meet the Carter Family who took on the 'Zero Waste' challenge last September. How do they do it?

The Building Blocks program celebrates 10 years

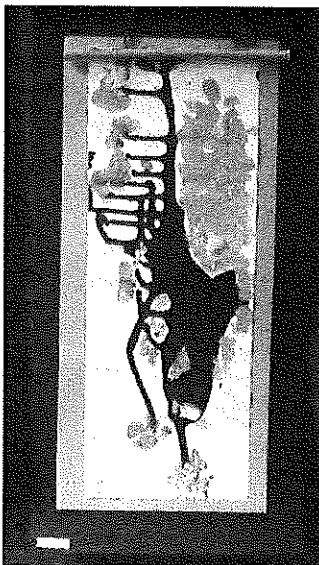

Hub4
Health
Community Development Centre

Since 2006, Building Blocks has been funded by the Australian Government Department of Social Services with the aim of improving outcomes for young children and families in North Eastern Tasmania.

We take our early childhood programs out on the road to communities in all parts of Break O'Day, including St Marys, Fingal, Mathinna, Falmouth, St Helens as well as Bicheno, Coles Bay, Winnaleah and Gladstone.

In September we have marked a special 10 year anniversary with a range of celebrations, and the presentation of "My Special Place" - an art exhibition celebrating the voices of children from our community.

Events were held at the Break O'Day Child and Family Centre, Little Penguins Child Care in Bicheno, St Marys District School and Fingal, with over 160 people attending.

Many thanks to the following people who helped make it all happen: Natasha Speers (Building Blocks Support Worker), Hub4Health admin and board for their support, the team at Break O'Day Child and Family Centre, Nindarra and Clay for a beautiful Welcome to Country at St Helens, Rebecca Mason (LiL/LiFT St Marys District School) without whose help planning, promoting and supporting this event it would never have happened, Break O'Day Regional Arts for loan of display boards, all the students and class teachers at St Helens and St Marys Schools that entered art work, the team at Little Penguins Child Care for a delicious morning tea, the staff, students and families at Fingal Campus for their ongoing support and participation and the St Marys Child Care and Out of School Hours teams for their art work and assistance.

Thanks also to the Bay Kitchen, Purple Possum and Hayshed for assisting in catering and Amanda and Tamieka who made the amazing birthday cakes!

A special thank you goes out to all the children and families who have attended our programs over the last 10 years - our program appreciates your ongoing support and participation. We hope to have many more years to come.

For more information on how to come along to our program contact Tanya - 0400 002 116 or check out our Facebook page.

Mt Elephant and Beyond book review

This month's book was That Deadman Dance by Kim Scott, winner of the 2011 Miles Franklin Literary Award. Scott is a descendant of the Noongar people who lived along the shoreline of Southern Western Australia. This "contact" novel is an imagining of the early (1830s) relationships between the white settlers and the aboriginal people of the area. Scott says that his novel was "inspired" by history, and that he wanted to convey the "confidence ... and readiness to appropriate new cultural forms" of these people.

This is embodied in the main character, Bobby Wabalanginy, through whose eyes we see some of the story. He is a charismatic figure, a changer in his own tribe, who grows from a cheeky child to a wily and confident go-between for the Noongar and the white settlers. He learns to read and write English, to dress in European clothes, to mimic the alien behaviour and mannerisms of the strangers but can still move back into his own people's ways and customs. He is the survivor, while those of his tribe who survive the ravages of European illnesses become alienated and suffer at the hands of the new regime.

The book offers up the possibility of what might have been, had these two such different cultures been able to continue the early days of co-operation - when the whites were often dependent on the local knowledge of the Noongar for sheer survival, and the aborigines showed interest in sharing language and some aspects of culture.

We see this co-operation between the aborigines, the British settlers and the American whalers during the annual migration of the whales and the vividly described whale hunting and slaughter.

All too soon, however - with the introduction of sheep, farming, fence building and appropriation of land - the inevitable clashes began with the Noongar not understanding the European sense of ownership and being harshly and brutally punished for stealing.

There are sympathetic and more enlightened characters among the settlers and for a while it did seem as if something positive might come out of these early interactions. Alas, we all know the tragic story of what happened here and across the nation.

Scott's writing is lyrical and often poetic. His descriptions of the natural world are beautiful, and he attempts to convey the sense of mysticism and connection with the natural landscape shared by the Noongar.

This book is not an easy read. It often demands a leap of imagination to follow the chronology of the story as he moves backwards and forwards in time. He challenges our linear view of story and time, and we are forced to enter the sensibility of the Noongar mind and world view.

It is an important book and deals with the issue of clashing sensibilities and the inability to reconcile two different cultures. Ultimately it is a tragic story, but it does offer us a rather different view of how the tragedy unfolded.

What did you have for breakfast this morning?

As the Australian dairy industry faces an economic crisis, and I spread my morning toast, my mind drifts back to those childhood breakfasts when a block of golden yellow butter on a covered china plate graced the morning table rather than some spreadable concoction in a plastic tub. Duck River, wrapped in waxed paper which might well be used to line a cake tin and perhaps there would be fresh hot teacake ... dripping in melted butter and dusted with cinnamon and sugar as an after school treat. It's the stuff of childhood memories and belongs in the days of milk and cream in glass bottles, bread deliveries before school lunches were cut and cheese cut off a wheel by the grocer rather than hermetically sealed in plastic with a use by date months into the future ... cheese was purchased and eaten within the week in the house in which I grew up.

A little bit of online research provides a little insight into the fate of those childhood brands and tells the story of globalisation in a very local way.

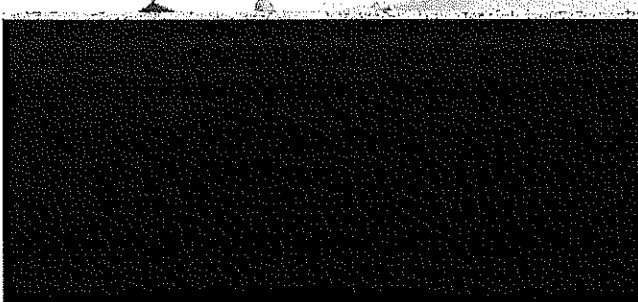

Tasmania's first co-operatively owned butter factory was floated by C B M Fenton in 1892 in the Wynyard region with 98 subscribers, and its product marketed as Lighthouse Butter. In 1963, the by then named Table Cape Company purchased the Yolla Dairy Company's butter factory to start its successful cheese-making venture. The merger between the Table Cape (Wynyard) and Duck River (Smithton) Companies, to form United Milk Products (effective from 31 January 1973), was an important rationalisation within the dairy industry following Britain's entry into the European Economic Community.

The Duck River co-operative was about the sixth dairy factory to begin operating in the Circular Head region. It was established in 1904 as the Duck River Co-operative Butter and Bacon Factory Company Ltd. Duck River purchased the Circular Head Butter and Cheese Factory (Stanley) in 1937, Tassie Cheese Company (Broadmeadows) in 1939, the Montagu Cheese Factory in 1948 and the Cadbury-Fry-Pascall (Edith Creek) milk powder factory in 1969. By the time of its golden jubilee (1954) Duck River was the largest butter producer in the state, reaching a top production of 4,106 tons in 1971.

The northeast too made an important contribution to the dairy products we ate on our daily bread during my Launceston childhood and I was no stranger to Ringarooma butter or Pyengana cheese - my father's favourite, the crumblier the better, on Savoy biscuits with Blue Banner Pickled Onions. In fact one of those family yarns, which loses little in the telling 50 years after the event, is that of my reaction to "Kraft in the blue box" cheese the first time I encountered it at an extended family picnic ... they tell me my face was a picture.

Unfortunately those buy ups, takeovers and amalgamations, together with globalisation and a market driven economy, led to the disappearance of a number of those local brands which were such a significant part of pre supermarket shopping. My instinct is that even where the labels remain it's pretty unlikely that the butter on my toast this morning was actually sourced "from the rich pastures of the far north west" however all is not lost. Certainly the remnants of the old cheese and butter factories, frequently abutted by disused piggeries which remain in the back streets of country towns are sad reminders of a by gone era, as are the silent rail lines and disused sidings where milk churns no longer await collection, but all is not lost. It would seem that a significant if small portion of the population shares my disdain for the modern version of "Kraft in the blue box" and once again fine cheese is being produced in the northeast. I think it unlikely I'll be buying Ringarooma butter any time soon, but I'm very happy to eat a Tasmanian cheese my father would have enjoyed.

"One thing you won't find much in Australian second-hand bookshops are 1950s or earlier editions of lots of books – The Catcher in the Rye, A Farewell to Arms, Animal Farm, Peyton Place, Another Country, Brave New World and hundreds and hundreds of others.

The reason for this is simple: they were banned. Altogether, at its peak, 5,000 titles were forbidden to be imported into the country.

By the 1950s this had fallen to a couple of hundred, but it still featured some extraordinary exclusions – Childbirth Without Pain, for instance, whose unflinching candour in describing where babies come from was considered a little too rich for Australian sensibilities. This was just conventional titles, by the way."

Break O'Day Council wins Building Surveying Team of the Year, Tasmania

Building Services Coordinator, Jake Ihnen said he was 'shocked and astounded' that a Local Government Organisation had won the award, particularly when the competition included established building surveyors in the private sector.

Mr Ihnen said the Building Services Team and Break O'Day Council were working collectively to improve service delivery and the public perception about Building Surveying and Local Government.

"We have been striving to improve our customer service and rapport with developers and this award proves that we really are on the right track," Mr Ihnen said.

"It's our goal to ensure developers understand the legislative and statutory reasons behind decisions made by the Building Surveying team but we also pride ourselves on working hard to look for alternative solutions for our clients.

"We aim to revolutionise the way in which Council Building Inspectors are portrayed by providing a higher level of customer service."

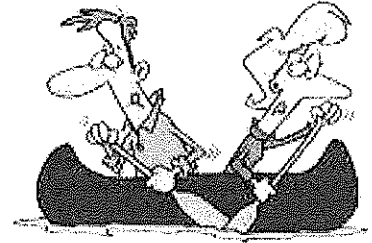

Break O'Day Mayor Mick Tucker said he was really proud of the Building Surveying Team.

"This award just shows how committed our staff are to our area and our community and this is a real feather in the cap of our Building Services Department," Cr Tucker said.

"We live in an amazing area filled with potential and we welcome the opportunity to grow and enhance what is already an amazing place."

OUT OF THE BLUE by Anne Collins ©

Set in the 1960s, Tom Campbell, husband of Vi, father of Meg and Rose, builds a ferro-cement boat in his Canley Vale back yard. The story tells of how this project takes over his life and the effect it has on his family. Told from Tom's point of view, the story's humorous edge captures the mood of a time when Sydney's suburbs were littered with the dreams of those whose ferro-cement hulls stood landlocked in small yards towering over modest houses.

Down at the Central, four-letter words were sparking across the public bar like firecrackers. Somewhere in the background a radio announcer was calling the Harold Park Trots. The end of the week and it was the same faces, the same drinks, the same arguments. Tom Campbell was thinking about the weekend. The last thing he wanted was to spend Saturday mowing the lawn - a waste of space all that grass - but Vi had it all lined up. That and a few other jobs.

Barry was rabbiting on, full of himself - something about some heavy-weight champion he'd met. Tom looked towards the door. He had to admit, he didn't enjoy the pub as much as he used to, he was thinking of leaving early but then, just at that moment, Parker came up behind him and slapped him on the back, splashing beer over his shirt.

"You're a winner, mate!" announced Parker looking at the others with a smirk on his face. "A dead-set winner!" Tom frowned.

"The boat mate, Frank's boat - the bet, you won the bet!" The bet? The stupid bet he'd made a few weeks ago about the football? Tom was just proving a point, Frank couldn't have been serious.

"Fair dinkum," continued Parker, watching Tom's face. "Frank's missus was threatenin' to go back to Germany! He's makin' plans t' deliver it, as we speak. As we speak, mate!"

"Frank's a man of his word," added Barry, "you can bet on that."

The group erupted into laughter and shouts for a new round. Tom looked across at Den, bewildered. What the hell was he going to tell Vi?

"It's a whopper mate," Den confirmed, as if reading his mind.

Later that night Den dropped Tom home, by then he was more than tipsy.

"I knew you'd be in a state" Vi scolded as she opened the front door.

"Night Mrs C." Den left quickly.

Inside Tom announced that he was the proud new owner of a boat.

"What nonsense are you coming home with this time?" Vi was trying to steady him towards a chair.

"Jus' nee's a bi' of finishin' love."

Groaning with his weight, Vi lowered him into a lounge chair. Tom had his arms around her and pulled her towards him for a hug. She loosened herself from his grip and turned to go to the kitchen.

"I'm not your love. Sit there and behave yourself."

"Years of enjoymen'," he added, smiling to himself as she left the room.

A couple of weeks on, late one afternoon, Tom took a saw to the gum at the bottom of the garden and started dismantling part of the fence that divided the back of their property from a vacant piece of land owned by the council. The boat was due to be delivered the next day.

Vi came down from the house to see what he was up to. He'd not said much more since that night he got home from the pub, but he'd been over to Frank's place and knew what was in store.

"We'll bring it in this way," he explained as if this were perfectly normal.

"Most people would use the driveway."

"It's . . . a fair size, you might say . . . we don't want it scraping the house. You know how narrow the driveway is."

"And, getting it out again?"

"One thing at a time," said Tom trying to sound logical. "We'll have her moored somewhere eventually, of course," he pointed out, "she won't be spending the rest of her life here." Canley Vale, where they lived, was about two hours from the coast.

"Moored? From what I've seen most people keep their boats in their yards, like Bob."

Bob lived a few doors along. He had a motorboat. Tom could feel his ulcer playing up, and knew that he and Vi were heading for a clash.

The next day nothing less than a lorry delivered a thirty-two foot ferro-cement hull that stood about ten foot high. All the neighbours gathered to watch - the women stood together looking aghast, their arms folded over their aprons; the men scattered themselves about, ready to lend a hand, as if they'd been part of the plan all along.

The lorry groaned its way into the Campbell's back yard, leaving deep tread marks and scraping Vi's camellias by the back fence. The hull was unlashed and the spreaders were rigged. Then a mobile crane was brought in to remove the hull from the lorry. It just fitted into the remaining space in the yard, not far from the back of the house. The crane squeaked and lurched the hull into position, settling the keel onto the chocks. The slope and the balance had to be right.

Once it was secured by the lorryjack, Tom, Den, Frank and the other men rallied around to build some basic scaffolding. That's when Meg came down from the house with a message. "Mum wants to see you - she said NOW."

During all of this, Vi had stayed inside. Tom looked knowingly at Den. "Back in a sec." He strode up to the house, he could see Vi's terse face through the screen door. "Here we go," he mumbled.

As expected, Vi was furious but she kept her voice lowered. "The hide of you Tom Campbell - down there in all your glory, the great man and his boat. I'm nothing but a laughing stock!"

Tom looked at the floor. Best she lets off steam, he reasoned, get it over and done with.

"Is this some kind of bad dream or what? My lawn's been butchered." All Tom could think of was how he wouldn't have to mow it anymore. "How am I supposed to get the washing dry with that monstrosity towering over the clothesline? Carrying on like it was no bigger than a row boat."

"I never said that," protested Tom, "you're the one -" Vi stabbed his chest with her finger, she was almost spitting.

"And you, Tom Campbell, conveniently failed to say that the thing was almost as big as the house. I should've known when you took those palings off the fence. Damn you!" Tom could hear a whole lot of banging and shouting outside. "Better get out there." He turned his head towards the back yard.

"Yes well, don't mind me, I'm only your wife after all." Her tone stayed with him as Tom wandered back down the yard. He caught Den's eye and cocked his head back towards the house. "Not a pretty sight, mate."

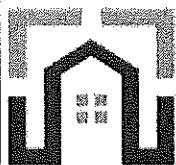

Den shrugged. He's right, thought Tom, there's not much he could do now. It's not like he could take it back in a hurry.

The women had gone off, leaving their husbands behind, who were now in full swing, calling out and laughing. Their excitement rubbed off on Tom and made him feel better. After a couple of hours, under Frank's direction, the group had erected four pairs of side props diagonally braced together, bow and stern supports and a pair of main posts that were sunk into the ground and secured to the starboard. Tom brought out a slab to thank them. The rest of the afternoon turned into a bit of a party. Every now and then Tom's thoughts drifted to Vi up in the house, but they didn't linger there. Over the course of that day something in Tom had changed and he decided that this big beast had arrived on his doorstep for a reason. Here was a chance to do something different. He raised his glass to Den.

"Some boat, eh?"

"We'll get her in shape in no time."

Lemon Curd

Ingredients

110g (½ cup) sugar
2 large lemons, juiced
and zest finely grated
3 large free-range eggs
lightly beaten
100g unsalted butter, cut into cubes

Instructions

Place sugar, zest and juice in a saucepan over low heat, stirring until sugar dissolves. Remove the pan from the heat and gradually add eggs, stirring to combine.

Return the pan to low heat and add the butter, a piece at a time, whisking constantly for 8-10 minutes until thickened.

Remove from heat, transfer to a bowl, cover surface with baking paper and chill lemon curd until ready to serve or pour into sterilised jars.

Cook's notes

Oven temperatures are for conventional; if using fan-forced (convection), reduce the temperature by 20°C. We use Australian tablespoons and cups: 1 teaspoon equals 5ml; 1 tablespoon equals 20ml; 1 cup equals 250ml.

Singulair: Doctors, pharmacists, regulators shift blame over asthma drug side effects warning by Meredith Griffiths

Doctors, pharmacists and regulators are all shifting the blame when it comes to who is responsible for warning parents that a common asthma drug can have severe psychiatric side effects.

Recently 7.30 reported the Therapeutic Goods Administration (TGA) had received almost 90 reports of psychiatric events, including suicidal thoughts, in children and adolescents treated with Singulair's active ingredient, a drug called Montelukast.

Since then more parents have contacted the ABC saying their children became suicidal, depressed, or violently angry while taking Singulair.

John, who did want his last name used, said his seven-year-old daughter had been taking Singulair for about a year when he noticed she started having irrational tantrums.

"They'd end up with her biting us and kicking us and screaming on the floor, and then after she'd calm down, which might be like an hour, she'd say things like 'I can't be good, it's impossible, I'm not good enough, why was I ever born, I don't like myself, why am I so weird, I hate myself,'" he said.

John said she started making comments like that every day. "There is nothing in the world quite like hearing your seven-year-old full of self-loathing," he said.

After searching online John and his wife learned Singulair could have behavioural side effects. They took their daughter off the drug and she was better within weeks.

Suicidal thoughts and actions, depression, aggression and hostility are listed side effects on the Consumer Medicines Information for Singulair, but like many parents John said he and his wife never got verbal or written warnings from their doctor or pharmacists, or information leaflets in boxes of Singulair. The Australian Medical Association (AMA) said parents might have been warned but not realised it.

"Most prescribers do warn, but it might not be in a way that the family have recognised it," Richard Kidd, the chair of the AMA's Council of General Practice, said. "The doctor may have had said something to the effect that this medication could affect the way the child is thinking and, you know, if you've got any concerns come back at talk to me — which is not the same thing as saying your child could become suicidal, which is a really scary, confronting thing to say."

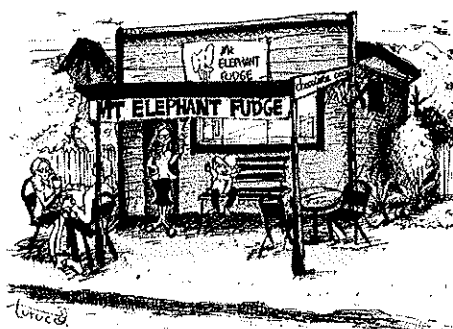

He said it was pharmacists' responsibility to give patients the Consumer Medicines Information.

Nobody from the Pharmacy Guild was available for comment, but in an emailed statement a spokesman said pharmacists were not required to provide the Consumer Medicines Information to patients but were to use their professional judgement on the need for and provision of counselling patients about the use of their medicine.

Parents are pushing for labels to be clearly displayed on packets of Montelukast warning that the drug can cause mood and behavioural changes, including suicidal thoughts.

Richard Kidd from the AMA said he did not support box warnings.

"It is such an uncommon side effect and it is a medication that has such benefit for so many people I don't think it needs a warning label on the box," he said. "As I said, the CMI is supposed to be in the box so it's there to be read when they get the box."

I look forward to seeing you! ☺

The Pharmacy Guild said it was a matter for the Therapeutic Goods Administration. Last week the TGA told the ABC medicines did not generally have warning statements on the box because the information was in the Consumer Medicine Information and there was an expectation the prescriber explained the risks and benefits to the patient.

Waiting periods to see your doctor may be experienced. We are not able to issue scripts during the weekends, please ensure you have enough in advance.

Please be aware we are not able to issue scripts by phone

St Marys Medical Practice reminder

Dr Latt wishes to remind the community of the following exceptions to bulk billing at SMCHC:

Driving licence renewals	Insurance medicals
Requested medical reports	Harness medicals
	Pre-employment checks

The above are NOT covered by Medicare and may incur cost. Please discuss this with reception when making your appointment. If you have any concerns, please contact us and we will try and address them.

Non-attendance of Doctor's Appointments

Please be aware there is a non attendance policy at this practice. If you miss three appointments you will be sent an account.

If you miss a fourth appointment you may be referred to another Medical Practice.

Due to demand, doctor's appointments need to be booked at least two weeks in advance.

Waiting periods can apply.

SMCHC Teaching Site

We are a UTAS teaching site. We regularly host students from various health faculties, who attend our site to participate in training placement.

If you are attending this practice and would prefer the students do not sit in on your consultation, please inform reception prior to your appointment.

These placements are very important for the students, so your cooperation is greatly appreciated.

There will be a Medical Student and two Nursing Students on placement during the month of October 2016

"I was listening to Scott Morrison on Monday speaking about what a burden migrant parents are. My migrant parents didn't have a word of English when they came to Australia (like so many). They raised two human rights lawyers with eight degrees and an Order of Australia medal.

My parents slaved away on farms and in factories doing shit jobs most people wouldn't touch, for decades until their bodies couldn't take it anymore, like so many migrant parents. That was ok though ...

Sick of this racism. So damn sick of it.

The Turnbull government insults every one of you, whose parents or grandparents sacrificed everything for you and gave so much back to this country.

Unless you are Indigenous, we are all descendants of boat people on Aboriginal land."

- Kon Karapanagiotidis, ASRC CEO

Kendall. Oh, kid, lighten up.

For real, though, I obviously don't know what it's like having a camera in my face all the time, THANK GOD, but ... It is INCREDIBLY disingenuous, to me, to flip off the paparazzi when you and your family have sought and re-sought that kind of attention, and built your empire on inviting those cameras into your homes and into your lives (and onto your sidewalks). If someone was harassing her, then I take it back, obviously, but if she's just being a cranky pants on her way to change for a party, then get a grip, kid.

This is reaping what you all sowed.

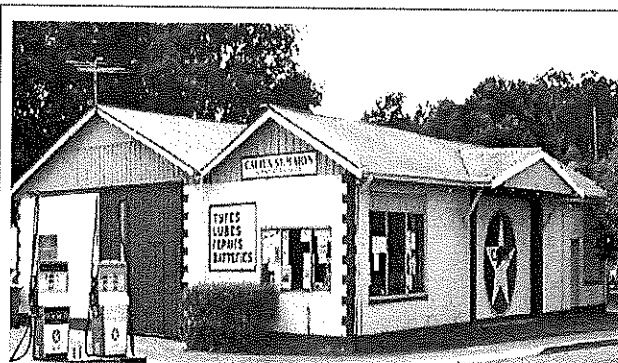

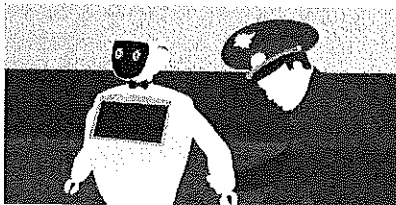

Robot arrested by Russian police at political rally in Moscow

A robot has been detained by police at a political rally in Moscow, with authorities attempting to handcuff the machine. The rally was for Valery Kalachev, a candidate for the Russian Parliament, who had rented the robot for his campaign.

Police have not confirmed why they detained the machine named Promobot, but local media was reporting the company behind the robot said police were called because it was "recording voters' opinions on a variety of topics for further processing and analysis by the candidate's team".

A Promobot representative suggested it was detained because "perhaps this action wasn't authorised". Mr Kalachev has featured the robot at previous campaign stops.

A different Promobot model made headlines in June when it made two breaks for freedom from a scientific research lab in Moscow. The robot was being taught to move around on its own when a worker reportedly left a gate open. Promobot travelled to a nearby street, stopping when its battery ran out, the BBC reported.
