Representatives from Tasmania's Online Access
Centres have called on Education and Training Minister Jeremy Rockliff to meet with them and hear for himself how valuable the centres are in servicing the people in their communities.
The future of the OACs is under threat as the Government looks to consolidate remaining centres into LINC. Of the 70 centres originally operating, only 20 remain. Pages 6, 7

Fingal centre co-ordinator Kerri Webb said people in her area would suffer, for instance those who used the services for online study purposes.
"I'll lose my job but more than that, the town is also losing another service. You can place the computers elsewhere but a lot of people require my assistance to do their resumes or online study," she said.

"We seem to have no voice whatsoever in this decision, and yet again it is small towns which are affected."

Esk Main Road - St Marys Pass Stabilisation Works 2016 - Notification of Contract Award

The Department of State Growth will soon commence stabilisation works on St Marys Pass on Esk Main Road. These works will commence in late-October 2016 and will cease in mid-December 2016.

Tasmanian company VEC Shaw Joint Venture has been awarded the construction contract for these works. It is expected that the contractor will commence on site from Monday, 24 October 2016.

From Monday, 31 October 2016 until Monday, 16 December 2016, St Marys Pass will be closed to all traffic from Monday to Friday between the hours of 9am and 2pm.

Outside of these hours, works will continue under traffic management and motorists may experience short delays. Access to the East Coast will be available via Elephant Pass Road at all times.

Variable Message Boards will soon be installed in the area to advise motorists of upcoming works and closures. Further information about the project can be found on the Department of State Growth website: http://www.transport.tas.gov.au/road/projects/esk_main_road - st_marys_pass_stabilisation_works_2016

The Say, by Cagerattler

I sat there the other night on a politics dedicated channel, replaying the second U.S. Presidential debate between Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump. Now I see why Louis Bruette, my friend in Baltimore Maryland, is so embarrassed and was one of the topics of a Valley Voice contribution recently.

Donald Trump is beyond belief. This man has no scruples, is egotistical, doesn't know what sorry means, is sanctimonious and has scant manners to say the least. How can someone this insensitive and egocentric be even considered as a worthy candidate for the office of US President? Beggars belief. During this debate I was transfixed and wondering how his insults could have no bounds. No real policies, no real answers, no real substance. It was a hate session.

Hillary Clinton is by no means perfect - she's demonstrative and a bit loud - but in comparison she has vast experience and knows the system better than most new Presidential candidates. It seems one reason why some Americans are baulking at voting for her is because she is a woman, others because she's portrayed as being a little underhanded and loose on email securities, and oh yes her husband's former philandering.

Why am I writing this you may justifiably ask? The reason is this; whether you like it or not Australia is inexorably linked with the USA on trade, military and culturally, and things going bad for them means things going bad for us. Ever heard this phrase about the world's biggest economy? "If America catches a cold then everyone else gets the flu".

Imagine this - just say Trump wins. The maniacal Islamic extremist groups will lay claim to more terrorist activity because of his myriad of stupid rants. People will needlessly die, because this bloke will incite more hatred. There's already too much. Remember Salman Rushdie's book a few decades ago, and that was just a damn one opinion book the Satanic Verses referring to Islamic words and so on. If the world's perceived most powerful leader goes crazy wanting to go gung ho, then where will it end?

Guess what? This man is scarier than any terrorist. He is a very real threat for the rest of the world, not just the USA ... What do you think?

TasWater investigates Cornwall's future drinking water supply 17 October 2016

Options for an upgraded water system will be presented to residents of Cornwall before the end of the year as TasWater assesses opportunities to provide the community with a secure water supply that is safe to drink and meets current health standards. TasWater's CEO Michael Brewster and General Manager Corporate and Community Relations, Juliet Mercer, met with Council representatives and Cornwall residents on October 4.

Discussion at the meeting focused on TasWater's Small Towns Water Supply Strategy and progress being made on improvements to the town's water quality.

Cornwall is one of 24 towns across the state currently on a permanent Boil Water Alert or Do Not Consume Notice. TasWater has committed to the introduction of long-term solutions for all of these towns by August 2018.

Two options considered at the meeting include an upgrade of Cornwall's existing water supply system and the option of service replacement. Service replacement would involve the installation of individual tanks at each Cornwall property providing residents with rain water collected off the roof. This option would only proceed if it is supported by the majority of property owners in the community, with a nominal threshold of 80% support.

All options will be fully investigated and TasWater will be providing residents in Cornwall with more information before the end of the year in the form of a fact sheet. The fact sheet will provide information on both the upgrade of the town's existing water supply - drawn from a nearby mine shaft - and will also outline the process of service replacement. TasWater hopes this will help inform the community as to the impact of future developments.

"While many residents are generally happy with the current water supply, TasWater has an obligation to comply with quite stringent health regulations in regard to water quality," TasWater CEO Michael Brewster said this week. "At present Cornwall's water fails to meet these standards hence its on-going Boil Water Alert."

TasWater unveiled plans in August this year to spend $1.5 billion over the next 10 years addressing the state's long-standing water and sewerage issues, after failing to secure additional State or Federal Government funding.

TasWater is expecting to halve the number of towns on permanent health alerts by 30 June 2017 and then remove all remaining permanent alerts before the end of August 2018.

"Cornwall is central to this aim and as it has been on a permanent Boil Water Alert for a number of years, TasWater will be working very hard to achieve a significant improvement in the quality of the town's water supply," Mr Brewster said. A range of options will be considered for each of the 24 communities included in the Small Towns Water Supply Strategy. Mr Brewster said TasWater would be working to ensure that the solution chosen for each town is sustainable and affordable, and that it meets the needs of TasWater's customers.

"To achieve this TasWater will continue to consult with the Cornwall community and will keep residents informed of any progress," Mr Brewster said this week.

Cornwall residents are advised the existing Boil Water Alert will remain in place until a long term solution has been implemented and TasWater has conducted a comprehensive water quality testing program. Residents will be notified in writing when the Boil Water Alert has been officially lifted by the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS). Customers will continue to receive a 20% discount on their variable water charge until the Boil Water Alert has been lifted.

Break O'Day Council encourages nature interaction with new playground

A new playground designed to encourage interaction and engagement with nature as well as foster a childlike sense of wonder, has been installed in St Helens. The Lions Club park on the corner of the Tasman Highway and St Helens Point Road Intersection until now had very little to offer families, so Break O'Day Council, after much research, decided to install a Nature Based playground.

"One of our area's biggest attractions is our natural environment so a playground of this nature seemed not only ideal but based on the developmental attributes, the perfect choice," Break O'Day Mayor Mick Tucker said.

Landscape Designer Karen Johnson was tasked with the job of masterminding the project which she said emulated the natural environment and incorporated elements to stimulate the senses. "I believe, and research shows, providing natural outdoor spaces for children is vital to their good health and the health of our planet," she said. "I've come to understand the wonderful learning and development opportunities these playgrounds provide, while encouraging exploration and creativity through the use of natural elements. Materials such as rocks, logs, water, soil and plants allow children to interact with nature and challenge themselves in a stimulating and safe environment as well as developing an appreciation for nature and learning about nurturing living things."

The playground has been designed to cater for wheel chair access with extra wide pathways and includes a basket swing which Ms Johnson said is suitable for all ages and abilities. Natural elements such as logs and rocks offer an opportunity to engage with nature but also provide developmental outcomes by encouraging balance and imagination as well as providing casual seating for carers, parents and guardians. Ms Johnson has included native plantings like She-Oak, Banksia, salt bushes and grasses which mimic the natural environment and create 'wild spaces' for children to enjoy.

"There is a real shift towards natural outdoor playspaces because these types of areas provide stimulating play, learning and development opportunities," Ms Johnson said. "We are very pleased with the playground and by the looks on the faces of the children who have been using the area, it's obvious they are enjoying the experience," Mayor Tucker added.

Mt Elephant and Beyond Book Club Review

Our Book Group read Alex Miller's novel, Autumn Laing, this month. In a type of postscript entitled "How I came to Write Autumn Laing" Miller says, "Autumn Laing is a story about the intimate lives of passionate, ambitious and gifted people, it is a story about their loves, their hates and their betrayals, but it is also a story about Australian art and culture and some of the questions and problems Australian art and culture have had to confront and which they continue to confront today." He claims to have come to this novel firstly through the work of Sidney Nolan, which represented the landscape familiar to Miller from working in outback Queensland when he came to Australia from England at the age of 16. However, as the idea for the novel grew, he found the voice of Autumn Laing taking over, till she became the focus of his story.

During the 1930s and 40s a community of artists, poets and writers gathered at the home of a wealthy, privileged and artistically passionate couple on the outskirts of Melbourne. The property was Heide and the couple were John and Sunday Reed. This novel takes aspects of, and incidents from, the lives of these real people and constructs an imagined version of parts of these lives. Autumn Laing is in some ways Sunday Reed, John Reed becomes Autumn's husband, Arthur, and Pat Donlon is Sidney Nolan.

It is a fiction within a fiction. Autumn is writing her memoir as a cantankerous, embittered woman of 85, looking back on her tempestuous affair 50 years before with the rebellious developing artist Pat Donlon. Eventually her story is edited and published by an American journalist and companion, Adele, who spends the last few months of Autumn's life living at Lost Farm (Heide) with her, researching the history of the group. Donlon rejects the conventions of the art world which until now have been European oriented, and, encouraged by Autumn, finds his inspiration and expression in the Australian outback landscape, firstly through delving through the accounts by the lost explorer Leichhardt and then actually spending time in the outback. Abandoning his pregnant wife, herself a talented artist but of the more conventional kind, he lives with Autumn and her husband, supported in a menage a trois at Heide until he abandons them too as his career takes off.

As an old woman Autumn is eaten up by guilt at her part in the betrayal of the wife and bitterness at her own abandonment by Donlon, and explores her memories and feelings in her writing.

There has been much criticism in recent years of what has become known as "faction", the re-imagining of the lives and motivations of real people now dead. This is another example of such writing. The fact that Sunday Reed died only 40 years ago may bring some readers to question the ethics of the venture, but Miller claims that these people were merely the inspiration for his exploration of the artistic drive. Miller is a gifted writer and he has certainly created vivid and memorable characters with very human vulnerabilities in this novel.

Fishing report brought to you by members of Break O'Day Sports Angling Club
Meet 7:30 1st Tuesday of the month. St Helens Marine Rescue HQ

Just when things seem to be settling back to normal, down comes another deluge, the Bay fills with tea coloured water and fishing research goes out the window ...

Spare a thought for our shellfish producers, when will they get a smooth run (and my thanks to Ian Coatsworth, the oysters in the nick of time were truly delicious)?
However, we do have some reports:

The salmon are still in the Bay and good Trevally have been taken off the jetties. I took some good fish exploring the edge of the coloured water, struggling with the wind and tide, in the channel off Akaroa. Squid are patrolling the seagrass flats and seem hungry, I caught one next to a visiting boater while it was trying to snack on its mate impaled on his jig and about to be netted (they're not team players). The King George Whiting are beginning to show, but not reliably yet and I was going to announce some good garfish schools, but the latest flood put paid to that. Bream in the estuaries are on the move, influenced by the rapid fluctuations in fresh water and there are salmon off the beaches.

Outside, the flathead remain scarce and reports of night-time lights have led to the usual trawler accusations, particularly north of Binalong. I'm still awaiting news of king flathead, they're due. But, the tuna remain on the shelf - if the weather provides opportunity for smaller boats.

To the fresh: it's "a land of flooding rains" and club plans to seek trout chasing Mayflies on the Break O'Day may come to nought with rivers high and coloured, some remaining quite dangerous with undercut banks and significant debris. Members have been pushing farther afield with Lake Leake still fishing well as it spills, and there are good signs of Mayfly hatching on Four Springs. Highland Lakes are brimming and good fish have been spotted in Arthur's and lost in Penstock. Much access remains problematic with such an abundance of surface water, it portends a good season ahead.

So ... we'll focus on how far an angler will roam in pursuit of a fish; from The Flathead Classic, Gold Coast. QLD Barra and Cook Island Bonefish and Mahi Mahi.

I'm a bit envious of fellow members travelling to escape the cold. If you're interested in finding out more, Chris will be giving a presentation on his Aitutaki Pacific Islands experience at our January meeting, and Kev will report on the Gold Coast Flathead classic upon his return. Gavin might even let you into where he got that Barra. Should be motivating.

Adjectives in English absolutely have to be in this order: opinion-size-age-shape-colour-origin-material-purpose Noun.

So you can have a lovely little old rectangular French silver whittling knife. But if you mess with that word order in the slightest, you'll sound like a maniac.

It's an odd thing that every English speaker uses that list, but almost none of us could write it out. And as size comes before colour, green great dragons can't exist.

... Tolkien became sidetracked by an interest in the subtleties of language:

'When I was about seven. It was about a dragon. I remember nothing about it except a philological fact. My mother said nothing about the dragon, but pointed out that one could not say "A green great dragon," but had to say "a great green dragon." I wondered why, and still do. The fact that I remember this is possibly significant, as I do not think I ever tried to write a story again for many years, and was taken up with language.'

Avoca water pipeline progressing well

Fully treated water for the Fingal Valley town of Avoca is getting closer every day.

The 29 kilometre pipeline which will supply treated water to Avoca from the Fingal water treatment plant is being laid in three stages alongside the Esk Highway.

The 110 millimetre diameter polyethylene pipeline is being laid from both the Avoca and Fingal ends with a third section of work dealing with more difficult terrain where the ground is rocky.

The bulk of the pipe line is being directionally drilled through the soil about a metre below ground.

First, the drill head and a series of metal rods, connected as they go, are drilled horizontally for about 140 metres. The pipe is then connected to the drill head and drawn back along the newly drilled section. Water is pumped through the pipe to assist the process. Each 140 metre section of pipe is then joined using electrofusion welding connectors.

The pipe laying project between Avoca and Fingal is being carried out by Tasmanian based company, Water Industry Solutions.

Most of the pipe is laid along the road reserve of the Esk Highway with workers on site reporting they have generally encountered good pipe installation conditions.

Water at Avoca will be stored in the existing town reservoir with the current equipment retained to boost chlorination levels in the water after arriving from Fingal.

TasWater CEO Michael Brewster says he is really pleased to see progress in water services to smaller communities in Tasmania.

"I am happy too, to use this year's national water week (16-22 October) to highlight projects around the state aimed at improving water quality."

"Avoca is just one of several towns where a significant amount of money is being invested, part of TasWater's annual spend of around $100 million on infrastructure upgrades."

And our work isn't going to ease up with plans to bring all our Tasmanian water supplies up to standard over the next two years so we can remove all existing boil water advisories.

Avoca residents should be receiving fully treated water by April 2017 following a period of commissioning

OUT OF THE BLUE by Anne Collins ©

Set in the 1960s, Tom Campbell, husband of Vi, father of Meg and Rose, builds a ferro-cement boat in his Canley Vale back yard. The story tells of how this project takes over his life and the effect it has on his family. Told from Tom's point of view, the story's humorous edge captures the mood of a time when Sydney's suburbs were littered with the dreams of those whose ferro-cement hulls stood landlocked in small yards towering over modest houses.

What was left of the yard was now filling up quickly with a range of items: hand rails, bow fittings, ventilators, masthead fittings, a toilet bowl, some locker doors, a galley sink and a set of old washing-machine doors: would-be port holes. Tom and Den would be gone all day, driving from one suburb to another, collecting fittings and talk. There was always a boat enthusiast with a good story.

It was amazing, really, just to see how many hulls there were, spread across the suburbs, each at different stages of completion. Some were huge, much bigger than Tom's, towering over tiny fibro houses. Tom enjoyed these outings, it was like belonging to a new kind of club. It was good to yarn with those who understood, instead of having to explain all the time, why he was still not near finishing.

On one of these Saturdays Tom arrived home with a load of paint, a special offer which he said would save money in the future.

"For the trimmings," he explained, as Vi stood counting the number of tins in the boot of the car. "Three tins were for free - you've got to have special paint you know."

"Trimmings!" Vi exclaimed with mock sarcasm. "So, you're on to the trimmings then?" She shook her head in disbelief. "What on earth did I do to deserve all this?"

Tom chuckled. Her humour caused a twinge of recognition in Tom's chest and he knew she was softening. Vi was still an attractive looking woman when she wasn't angry, her curly hair still that strong chestnut colour. Den admired her looks too, he didn't have a wife. "Did you go out looking like that?" she chided like a mother, nodding towards his crumpled shorts and thongs.

"I've got a name for her, Out of the Blue," Tom announced, and pointed to a paint tin, his source.

"Well, it was certainly that."

"Pure poetry, I reckon," Vi rolled her eyes. "Rub a dub dub, three men in a tub . . . you and poetry!"

On Sunday afternoons Vi began offering Tom and Den a cup of tea, and bringing them out a bit of cake. They tried to get her to come up and join them inside the hull.

"Just come across the plank," Tom directed. Vi was standing at the top of the back steps.

"If you think I'm doing some trapeze act with this tray -" Vi walked down the steps and over to the ladder at the side of the boat. When she reached the top she looked at Tom, then nodded back towards the tray she'd left near the door.

"Well?"

Tom scampered across the plank, remembering for the first time in ages what he'd always loved about Vi: her fighting spirit. Yet he rarely understood the depths to which it carried her, carried both of them in fact. This was the first time since the hull's arrival that she'd agreed to come on board and it eased Tom's conscience. "Thanks Mrs C.," Den raised his cup to her as if it were a glass of beer.

"Yeah thanks love," Tom added as he tucked into the fruit cake, slightly embarrassed at actually having Vi sitting there with them. At that moment he knew he didn't thank her enough - thank her for putting up with him. Most of the time something constrained him and any kindly thoughts he had towards her became stuck in his throat as soon as he tried to turn them into words.

"So what're you two working on today?" she asked, looking at the dense curve of the cement, wave-like at the back of her head. Tom looked over to Den.

"The hatches Mrs C," Den replied clearing his throat, "renovatin' the hatches." Vi frowned.

"The doors," Tom cut in, "for getting inside here. We picked them up last Saturday."

"I know what hatches are Tom Campbell, but you haven't done the roof yet," Vi noted looking up at the sky.

"The deck you mean - well, we've got to net that first . . . all in good time." Den nodded emphatically, as if trying to convince Vi it would all work out in the end. That evening Vi walked in on Tom in the bathroom. He'd been covering the wall above the mirror with photos of the boat, each taken from different viewpoints.

"For the life of me! I can't get away from the damn thing!" "It's for study purposes, while I'm shaving. It's suggested in one of my books."

"Eighteen months on and you're studying now. It was meant to be finished, remember? You've gone about this all wrong Tom Campbell, you're scattered! Junk all over the place - what's that latest rubbish in boxes?"

"Ballast." "What?"

"To keep her steady on the water." Vi turned back towards the hallway.

"You're the one who needs steadying."

There were days out there on his boat in the back yard at Canley Vale, when Tom imagined he could almost smell the sea air, feel his cheeks ruddy and delight in the imaginary whiff of coffee on the burner after a day out in the wind. He would take deep, calm breaths with these thoughts, and this made him more and more inclined to spend his evenings outside, especially once the weather started warming up again.

One night there was a heavy storm, the kind of occasional storm that sent down hail stones the size of golf balls, and Tom decided the boat needed shelter. The winds had blown off the huge tarpaulin and twisted it around the scaffolding, while the hull had filled with several inches of water.

Over the following couple of weeks Tom and Den built a frame over the hull complete with corrugated roof. It was the fastest piece of work completed yet. Then a few weeks further on, Tom walled in some of the frame with more scrap tin. The new structure covered the boat more than adequately but blocked the afternoon sun from the laundry, kitchen and dining area. Vi exploded all over again, the growing moments of peace between them now shattered.

"I think you've gone a bit mad, Tom Campbell."

Not that Tom expected her to understand. "It's only temporary."

He kept his voice level, he preferred the rational approach.

"You're lucky no-one's gone to the council - now there's an idea! You call two years temporary? I can barely remember what our yard looked like - that's right I used to have flowers and a beautiful green lawn."

Tom's perseverance exceeded everyone's expectations. And for all Tom's fiddling about, as Vi like to put it, the spare parts he'd collected were now cleaned up and waiting in the shed. By autumn of the third year, the deck beams were up and Tom started covering them with the rolls of wire he'd collected. He was more or less on his own now, since Den's knee operation, but one Saturday while Joe was visiting with Rose, Tom got him to help tie the wires to the outside of the stringers.

After a few weeks the deck netting was completed and looked the right shape, square and firm around the beams. The next job would be to plaster it all. Tom went back to the books in order to estimate the details as accurately as possible: the grade of cement, the thickness of the covering. Harry next door helped him finish the task from the top side, grouting, plastering, then water-curing. The job looked beautiful next to the patchy example left by Frank, it was worth taking that extra bit of time to do things properly.

Around this time though, things started to change. First it was the photos.

"Where's m' photos from the bathroom?" he asked Vi one morning.

"I've put them away in a drawer."

"Have y'now? You didn't ask me about that." Tom still needed them to refer to.

"They're all blotchy and curled from the steam," stated Vi. Tom decided not to make an issue of it, even though he felt put out by this interference. Instead, he took the photos from the drawer and went outside to pin them up on the wall of the boat shelter.

Then another night, when it suddenly seemed a lot later than usual, Tom noticed he was hungry. Vi hadn't called him. When he got inside, the kitchen was all cleaned up. The clock said 8.30. Meg was in her room doing her homework.

"Where's your mother?" he asked. "Over the road." "What about tea?" "We've had ours. Shepherd's Pie."

"You're telling me you had tea?"

"Mum said, she's sick of calling and you never coming. You know when tea-time is Dad."

"So I'm stuck with baked beans then? Whose the one who works all week to buy the food?" Meg shrugged.

After that he took an alarm clock down to the hull so he'd know when it was six o'clock.

A few nights after that, when he came in from the yard to go to bed - around a quarter to eleven - he found it empty and the things from Vi's side-table gone. Then he noticed the dresser. All her brushes, combs, powder and perfume bottles were missing. He wandered through the house and saw a light on in Rose's room. He opened the door. There was Vi sitting up in Rose's bed with a cup of tea, reading one of her murder stories. She looked straight at him, like she'd rehearsed it.

"This is my room now." The missing things were all laid out on Rose's old dressing-table.

"You might as well know that all my things are in here." Vi glared at him.

"I've teed it up with Rose. She said 'Go ahead Mum, I would if I were you.' At least I get the sun in here and a bit of peace."

"Suit yourself," was all Tom could say. His mouth had gone dry from the shock.

Over time, Tom began discovering other things too, things that felt like secrets. It turned out that Vi had been spending a lot of time over at Noelene Johnson's place. Sewing she reckoned. Noelene had set up a business in her back room after her husband had died of the heart attack. Fair enough. But what did it have to do with Vi?

"She's on her own," Vi said when he asked. "I'm helping her out. She gets far more work than she can manage."

"She's payin' you?" "Naturally. And I'm saving." There was nothing natural about it as far as Tom was concerned. Vi was acting cagey.

"Saving for what?" "A trip - if you must know . . . to Queensland."

Next thing he knew there were L-plates on the table. "These yours?" he asked Meg who was nearly eighteen by then.

"No," she answered with a grin on her face that said she knew more than he did. Vi was learning to drive. Noelene was teaching her. They were planning to drive to Queensland.

"The girls are all for it," Vi said to him almost singing. That'd be right, thought Tom. He couldn't help but feel there'd been some kind of conspiracy going on behind his back.

Not long after this, Vi said the strangest thing of all. She said: "I'm tired of competing with the other woman in your life, Tom." Who did she think she was talking to? The only women Tom ever saw were the ones around here. He'd never been that sort of bloke. She'd probably been reading too many of those magazines. He thought then: she's losing it. Den said it could be that change-of-life thing women go through. So Tom said nothing. Best to play it down and give her time. She'll come round, sooner or later, he figured. Then things will be back to normal.

My name is Star and I was a feral kitty who was trapped and brought to NEAST.

I was a very scared kitty and would hiss and spit but when I went to my foster carer something happened ... I had a lovely lady who was so patient with me and fed me yummy treats. I really wanted to love her but I was very scared. Over time and with lots of love from my foster mum, I came out of my shell and wasn't so scared anymore. I learnt how nice a pat and a stroke felt.

I was moved to another foster mum so I could learn to get used to more people.

If you think you have the time and patience for me please talk to the nice ladies from NEAST about taking me on a two week trial

Zac loves humans there is no doubt about that!! Zac would benefit from a family or companion who is with him more often than not and as with all of our dogs we require the homes they go to, to have a secure yard. He loves the water and has great recall. If you think Zac could be your perfect match please contact us for more information.

Vets ask prospective dog owners to avoid pugs and other flat-faced breeds - written by an anonymous vet. I still remember when I was introduced to the concept of a "brachycephalic" (squashed-nosed) dog as a veterinary student. We were having our first anatomy lectures on the skull and the lecturer put up various slides (yes, slides – that's how long ago I trained to be a vet) showing x-ray images of dogs' heads. Various different-sized ones went up – a collie, a jack russell, a beagle and then suddenly an extraordinary image of a skull with a crushed nose and distended forehead. "What is wrong with this patient?" our lecturer asked. "Has it been hit by a car?" The students responded. "Has it been kicked? Is there a birth defect?" None of these was right, of course, because the lecturer had been waiting to give his punchline. "You are all wrong. It's just a pug".

And there you have it, brachycephalic dogs (which include pugs, bulldogs, French bulldogs and shih tzus) are an anatomical disaster. Every structure that should make up the nose has been squashed flat. The only time these dogs are not in some degree of respiratory distress is when you have them intubated under anaesthetic.

I have seen it myself: a bulldog comes in panting away with blue-tinged gums (normal for the breed), I anaesthetise it and put the tube in and as if by magic it pinks up and breathes normally – presumably its body is overjoyed to actually be receiving enough oxygen for once. Breathing aside, most of these animals also have other genetic abnormalities that result in illness, from back problems to eye issues.

This week, the British Veterinary Association's recommendation to think twice before buying one of these dogs hit the headlines and suddenly people are talking about the issue. But if you had asked any practising vet in the past few years what they thought of brachycephalics they would have been as critical of these breeds as I am.

'Breathing aside, most of these animals also have other genetic abnormalities that result in illness, from back problems to eye issues.'

In light of all this, the question has to be – why do vets not speak out more often? And therein lies the rub; the vast majority of us work in general practice and our income is based on mending people's animals and getting paid for it, and, like it or not, a large number of those clients have brachycephalic dogs. In my practice alone we have a number of pug, shih tzu and bulldog breeders and dozens of owners with squashed-nosed pets. If I stood up and told the truth about these breeds I would immediately alienate them and they would up sticks and move to the neighbouring practice where the vet was not as outspoken. Vets in general practice simply cannot afford to be honest and to speak out. You would be hard-pushed to find a general practitioner who likes the concept of a brachycephalic dog but you would be equally hard-pushed to find one being openly critical of them because this would put their livelihood on the line.

So I am delighted that the BVA has come out with its headline-grabbing advice – at last we can talk about the subject a bit more openly (although not openly enough for me to put my name to this column). My colleagues often debate the ethics of being in a profession that, despite its better judgment, helps to perpetuate these anatomical abominations – maybe it is time for us to take a stand.

"When I asked her once why she didn't walk to the gym and do five minutes less on the treadmill, she looked at me as if I were being wilfully provocative. "Because I have a program for the treadmill," she explained. "It records my distance and speed, and I can adjust it for degree of difficulty." It hadn't occurred to me how thoughtlessly deficient nature is in this regard." Bill Bryson, A Walk in the Woods

I was at this casino minding my own business, and this guy came up to me and said, 'You're gonna have to move, you're blocking a fire exit.' As though if there was a fire, I wasn't gonna run. If you're flammable and have legs, you are never blocking a fire exit.

Tasmania

Many Australian towns have a history of mining. As the mines close down, the towns reduced in size and availability of services, such as education. An example of this is Avoca, a small town of about 250 people in the mid-north of Tasmania. A main industry in the town now is making pavers out of left over material from the abandoned mines. Agriculture and forestry activities are also important to this town. There are 42 children at Avoca school. Only half of them live in town, the rest travel from nearby farming estates or small communities.

HEAT WAVE HITS TASMANIA

Buildings At St. Marys Menaced By Fires

OUTBREAKS IN VICTORIA

EXTREMELY hot weather in most parts of Tasmania yesterday was accompanied in several centres of the North-East by fierce bush fires. The St. Marys cheese factory and St. Marys Cottage Hospital were threatened, but were saved after strenuous effort by volunteer firefighters. Several homesteads in the district were endangered.

Hobart had its hottest day since February 23, 1939. The maximum temperature yesterday was 94.3 degrees at 2.45 p.m.

Thirty-one huts, 12 motor-cars, two motor-cycles, £2,000 worth of machinery and four tractors valued at £1,800 each were destroyed in fires at Saxton's logging camp at Tanjilbren (V.).

The world's largest recorded barramundi was caught by Dave Powell in Lake Tinaroo in September 1999.

The whopper measured 124 centimetres and weighed 38.75 kg.

Lake Tinaroo is in the Atherton Tablelands behind Cairns and is 3/4 the size of Sydney Harbour.

Some believe that there are even bigger barra than the one pictured, still swimming around in this lake.
